

When to start potty training? What is the right age for potty training?

You should start potty training your child at 30 months in Veez Bizzy BeeZ opinion, however, there is no set age at which potty training or toilet training should begin; the right time depends on your child's development and readiness.

Potty Training - Parents, try to stay away from bribes or snacks. It is a very easy way to train a child but try a potty sticker chart. When potty training a child, it's important to be consistent. Put your child on the potty every 30 minutes to 1 hour for about 5 minutes. Praise them when they use the potty and when they don't.

You never want to make potty training a negative experience. It should be a positive and fun adventure for you as a parent and for the child.

Poop Potty Training

In most children, bowel control develops before urinary control. This is the reason that many toddlers will let you know that they are having a bowel movement by their posture, gestures or facial expressions, but very few will let you know that they are urinating.

So, if your child has bladder control, chances are they have bowel control too. In most cases bowel movement training will almost happen naturally. This means that bowel movements usually follow urination, so once children are trained to urinate in a potty chair or on the toilet, they will also have a bowel movement while urinating.

You, as the parent have already set expectations that both pee pee and poo poo go into the potty, so that your child already knows what you expect. Give your child the extra praise the first time your child has a bowel movement in the potty, and in most cases, bowel movement training flows naturally after urine training.
